KNOW THE EATHER

By E. H. Sims

Do tornadoes occur over the ocean? Why is it that seamen seldom encountner vicious tornadoes?

Tornadoes do occur over the ocean. However, they are usually smaiier than their land-bred cousins, and they last only a few minutes, in most cases. The reason you do not hear sailors talking of tornadoes is that that they refer to what actually is a water tornado by another name — waterspout.

The waterspout was once a great mystery to seafarers. Even today much of the ignorance which still prevails concerning tornadoes also prevails in connection with the waterspout. But it is pretty well established that waterspouts do not suck ocean water up into their funnels (except for a few feet) and they are, in reality, ocean going tornadoes.

Thus, the funnel, if it contains water, contains water from the clouds above, not from the ocean. And the old idea that a "spout" from the ocean was involved is completely erroneous.

Waterspouts, or ocean tornadoes, are sometimes awesome sights to be sure, but they seem to be less vicious than the midwestern plains type and do little damage on the water.

A grushy relative of a preteen boy had not visited them for some time and greeted the boy with the standard, "Why, the last time I saw you, you were only so high!" "Yes," the lad, agreed, "and you were only so wide." —Capper's Weekly.

The discharge goes from the septic tank to a distribution box which distributed the liquid into the drainfield area. A drainfield is the most important part of a septic tank system. The field carries liquid from the tank into the soil where it is absorbed. In most instances it consists of drain tile in ditches 2 feet wide and 2 feet deep, with a gravel bed 6 inches thick under the tile.

The drainfield should be kept away from the water supply in a well-drained area, preferably on high ground, and in soil that will have a good absorption rate. It should be located where it will get plenty of sunlight. The best sites, generally, are open fields or yards which will not be part of a driveway. Heavy traffic is considered harmful to drainfield lines. Percolation tests should be made by a trained sanitarian or an experienced engineer.

Contact local dealth department before you start on a septic tank system. In many counties a permit is required and sanitarians can help plan the system. A poorly installed system is troublesome and also creates a public health hazard.

Rats Carry Serious Disease Of Swine

Rats can carry a serious disease of swine known as atrophic rhinitis, commonly called "crooked snout."

Since no cure for the disease is known, controlling rats is extremely important.

Put the chemical "Warfarin" out only in protected places where swine do not have access to the bait.

Atrophic rhinitis was first reported in this country in 1944. It is non-fatal but retards the growth of young pigs. A serious threat to the swine grower, the disease may be transferred to clean herds with swine bought for breeding purposes.

Persistent sneezing is an early—often the only—symptom. The disease may also cause nose bleeding, nasal mucous discharge, and coughing or irritation of the snout, which causes the pig to rub his nose against some solid object to seek relief. Lesions often develop in the nasal passages, and in advances cases the snout as well as surrounding facial features may be twisted and distorted. Pneumonia sometimes occurs as a secondary complication.

Geese To The Rescue

Flocks of geese are being put to work by some Virginia nurserymen.

The obliging birds were used by several nurseries in the state this past summer to "weed" blocks of nursery stock.

Since the principal diet of geese consists of grass and weeds, they eat a surprising amount each day. A limited amount of a balanced protein feed, and water, also is needed.

It is necessary to use a temporary fence around the block to be weeded, so arranged that it is easily moved from block to block, and secured with stakes. Dogs seem to be the only serious problem in the use of this industrious "labor crew."

Geese seem to do a good job in keeping nursery stock clean of grass and many weeds. However, some few large, rank weeds are left by the feathered employees. No damage of any kind to nursery stock has been blamed on the geese.

LAWN SEEDING DELAYED; BUT THERE'S STILL TIME

Seeding of lawns was delayed by dry weather throughout Virginia this season, but the recent heavy rains in much of the state have now put soil in good condition for germination of grass seed.

A. G. Smith, Jr., associate horticulturist at VPI, says home owners who have not been able to sow lawn seed before now can still have hopes of a successful turf. Seeding should be done at once.

Smith says old lawns may need some fertilizer and top-seeding to correct damage done by close mowing, dry weather, or grubs.

TAX CONFERENCES ARE PLANNED

Consultants and others who help farmers and small businessmen with tax reports are being invited to attend a tax conference this winter.

Dr. Harry Love, head of the agricultural economics department at VPI, says the conferences are planned for December 2-4 in Roanoke and December 9-11 in Richmond.

EVERYTHING FELL IN

Blytheville, Ark.- Fletcher Womack drove into a garage to get a 35-cent auto part and while reaching for the hand brake, accidentally stepped on the accelerator. The car lurched back and knocked a huge hole in a brick wall, which caused a large overhead door to fall on Womack's car. The impact somehow jarred the car's automatic transmission into forward gear and the vehicle jammed into another vehicle. Womack escaped injury and he also had insurance. He did not get the 35-cent part he wanted.
